One World: Back from the Front is a short but very moving and enlightening piece, interviewing three recent Veterans about their experiences in Iraq and Afghanistan. But for me, it reinforced precisely why I launched the Battlegames Combat Stress Appeal, as at least one of the interviewees is clearly a potential candidate for precisely the kind of help that Combat Stress are struggling to provide.

The front-end and back-end of a website interact with each other, and so do front-end and back-end developers. A back-end developer's role will include working with a front-end developer to ensure their behind-the-scenes code works within the visual design of the website. A back-end developer will deal more with logic than with creativity.

To make things easy, think about the front end as part of the iceberg above the water. It's what the user sees -- the sleek-looking site. The back end is the rest of the ice; it cannot be seen by the end user, but it is the most fundamental element of a web application. The back end runs on the server, or, as it's often called, "server ...
